Potential Project Effects to Historic Properties

Visual Effects

The Southern Expansion project area is in the context of many historic buildings and landscapes. The visual area of potential effects, or viewshed, of the project will be studied to determine effects on historic properties when designs have been developed.

Archaeological Potential: Low

Development of the Navy Annex, Military housing, and highways during the World War II era heavily disturbed the site.

The Freedman's Village dating to 1863 was within the current bounds of Arlington National Cemetery and off the Southern Expansion site.

Physical Effect: Arlington National Cemetery Boundary Wall

Sections of the south boundary wall of Arlington National Cemetery date to the 19th century, other parts to the late 20th century. All sections contribute to the ANC National Register of Historic Places listed historic district. Project planners must decide whether to relocate the wall or modify it in place.
